In the years after the war, these veterans were often forgotten by society. They were seen as a burden, a reminder of a conflict that people wanted to forget. They were left to fend for themselves, with little support or recognition for their service.

But even though they were forgotten by the world, these veterans never forgot their dream of a better future. They dreamed of a world where peace would reign and where all people would be treated with dignity and respect. They dreamed of a world where the sacrifices they had made would not be in vain.

The Forgotten Veterans

The forgotten veterans of World War I came from all walks of life. They were farmers, factory workers, teachers, and students. They were young men who had just started their lives, and they were old men who had seen it all.

But through it all, they never gave up hope. They clung to the dream of a better future, a future where they could live in peace and dignity.
