The Navy blue gold scandal began in 1981 when A. Ernest Fitzgerald, a civilian employee of the Navy, began investigating allegations of fraud and corruption in the Navy's shipbuilding program. Fitzgerald's investigation uncovered evidence that several defense contractors were overcharging the Navy for spare parts and supplies. Fitzgerald also found that the Navy was not properly inspecting the parts and supplies that it was purchasing, which led to the installation of defective parts on Navy ships.

Fitzgerald's investigation eventually led to the indictment of several defense contractors and Navy officials. The scandal also led to the resignation of Secretary of the Navy John Lehman, who was accused of ignoring Fitzgerald's warnings about the fraud and corruption in the Navy's shipbuilding program.

The Navy blue gold scandal had a major impact on the United States Navy. The scandal led to a loss of confidence in the Navy's leadership and in the defense industry. The scandal also prompted a major investigation by the United States Congress and resulted in the passage of several new laws designed to prevent future cases of fraud and corruption in the defense industry.

The Investigation

The Navy blue gold scandal was investigated by the United States Congress, the Department of Justice, and the Navy's Inspector General. The congressional investigation was led by Senator John Glenn (D-OH), who was the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. The Department of Justice investigation was led by U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani. The Navy's Inspector General investigation was led by Inspector General Frank Camm.

The congressional investigation found that the Navy had been overcharged by defense contractors for spare parts and supplies. The investigation also found that the Navy was not properly inspecting the parts and supplies that it was purchasing, which led to the installation of defective parts on Navy ships.

The Department of Justice investigation led to the indictment of several defense contractors and Navy officials. The indictments charged the defendants with fraud, conspiracy, and bribery. The Navy's Inspector General investigation found that there was a systemic problem of fraud and corruption in the Navy's shipbuilding program.

The Aftermath

The Navy blue gold scandal led to the resignation of Secretary of the Navy John Lehman. The scandal also prompted a major investigation by the United States Congress and resulted in the passage of several new laws designed to prevent future cases of fraud and corruption in the defense industry.
