Sarah is a young woman from a wealthy family in Boston. She is intelligent, compassionate, and has a strong sense of justice. When the war breaks out, she is determined to do her part to help the Union cause. She joins a group of nurses and travels to the front lines to care for the wounded.

Mary is a young woman from a plantation family in Mississippi. She is kind, gentle, and has a strong sense of family. When the war breaks out, she is torn between her loyalty to her family and her sympathy for the slaves. She eventually decides to stay on the plantation and care for her family and the slaves.

As the war rages on, Sarah and Mary's lives become intertwined. Sarah is captured by Confederate soldiers and taken to a prison camp in Richmond. Mary volunteers to help at the prison camp and she meets Sarah. The two women become friends and begin to understand each other's perspectives. They learn that despite their different backgrounds, they share a common desire for peace and unity.

After the war, Sarah and Mary return to their respective homes. They are both changed by their experiences and they are determined to make a difference in the world. Sarah becomes a doctor and dedicates her life to helping the poor and needy. Mary becomes a teacher and she teaches her students about the importance of tolerance and understanding.
